"The result of last weeks' Republican convention was a decided setback to extreme radicalism, and this week the Democratic convention has acted likewise. It does not mean that as between conservatism and progressivism the latter has been defeated. On the contrary, it means that not a few of the reforms desired by the people are shortly to be granted by one party or the other, since each party has striking features of resemblance and each is outbidding the other in the race to catch

"If the conventions held within the last two weeks mean anything, they mean that reforms are to come by evolution and not by revolution. Political leaders recognize that important changes are coming; changes that will benefit the masses and consequently the nation. And they must also recognize that these changes should be made gradually; that a sudden or violent disruption of established institutions and methods would throw our industrial system into chaos to the injury of all and the benefit of none.
